ABSTRACT

Background Starting from September 2014, all children aged four to seven received their school lunches for free in the UK, to increase healthy eating and decrease obesity.

Aim To investigate how school meals (especially school lunches) were depicted in different newspapers in the UK, from 2000 to 2014 when free school meals were introduced.

Method Four newspapers in the UK between the years 2000 and 2014 were chosen for the study. In total, 616 texts were found from which 426 were analysed. A combination of quantitative and qualitative analysis of articles and letters to press was made in several steps. The texts were read and grouped into several main messages/contents. These were grouped into subjects and put together in timelines to show when and how much they were depicted in media during the studied years. Finally the subjects were grouped into topics, to show the main focus during the time period.

Result During the years 2000 to 2014 several topics related to school meals were discussed. Among these were both positivity and negativity towards Jamie Oliver's school food campaign, unhealthy packed lunches, the ban of packed lunches, ban of going outside schools on school breaks and the free school meals plan and free school meals for all children aged four to seven. The free school meals and texts related to economy were the most discussed during these years. In the study it was possible to see that Jamie Oliver have been a big part of the results of free school meals for the children between four and seven.

Conclusion A long process could be seen progressing until free meals were given to all schoolchildren aged four to seven. There were regulations and actions towards better school meals and encouragements for children to choose the healthier foods. It is possible that people became more and more aware about health and school meals, and the relation between these over the years.

SAMMANFATTNING

Bakgrund Från och med september 2014, är alla barn i åldern fyra till sju berättigade till gratis skolmat i Storbritannien, för att öka hälsosamt ätande och minska fetma.

Syfte Att undersöka hur skolmåltider (speciellt skolluncher) avbildats i olika tidningar i Storbritannien, från och med 2000 till 2014, då gratis skolmåltider introducerades.

Metod Fyra tidningar i Storbritannien, under tiden 2000 till 2014, valdes ut för undersökning. Totalt 616 artiklar hittades, varav 426 texter analyserades. En kombination av kvalitativ och kvantitativ innehållsanalys gjordes i flera steg på artiklar och insändare. Texterna lästes och grupperade i huvudbudskap/innehåll. För att visa när och i vilken mängd dessa huvudbudskap/innehåll avbildades i de studerade medierna, blev dessa grupperade som ämnen och placerade i tidslinjer. Slutligen kategoriserades ämnena i grupper för att visa huvudfokus under tidsperioden.

Resultat Under åren 2000 till 2014 diskuterades flera ämnen som rörde skolmåltider i media. Bland dessa fanns både positiva och negativa inställningar till Jamie Olivers skolmatkampanj, ohälsosamma lunchboxar, förbud av lunchboxar, förbud mot att vistas utanför skolområdet under raster, samt planen för och införandet av gratis skolmat för fyra till sjuåringar. Gratis skolmåltider och texter relaterade till ekonomi var de mest diskuterade ämnena under åren. I studien var det möjligt att se att Jamie Oliver var en stor del av processen som lett till att barnen i åren fyra till sju fått gratis skolmat.

Slutsats En större process kunde ses framskrida fram till gratis måltider till alla skolbarn i ålder fyra till sju. Regler har tillagts och åtgärder gjorts för att få bättre skolmåltider och samtidigt uppmuntra barn att välja hälsosammare mat. Det är möjligt att allmänheten blivit mer medvetna om hälsa och skolmåltider samt relationen mellan dessa

Appendix 2. An overview of the discussed topics related to school meals in five newspapers in the UK from 2000 to 2014

1.0 Introduction

I moved to England in January 2014 and in September the same year the United Kingdom (UK) started giving free school lunches to all four to seven year old children (1). This process got a lot of media coverage during 2014 and there were both positive and negative opinions. I grew up in Finland and studied food and nutrition in Sweden, the two countries that have had free school lunches for all children for the longest time (2). So, for me, this is an obvious and an important matter towards public health. With this said, it was in my interest to look into how school meals were depicted in the media during the years leading up to the decision.

2.0 Background

Eating well is important for both children's and adult's health and it can prevent different kinds of diseases, such as obesity, diabetes and cardiovascular diseases (3-4). School lunches were introduced in Finland and Sweden to improve the health situation among children who were underweight and had a poor diet (5). Other countries have been discussing the introduction of school meals to prevent one of today's biggest health problems: overeating and obesity (6). One of these countries has been the UK.

In England it's not uncommon for both children and adults to be overweight or obese (7). In 2012 only 32% of English men and 40% of English women had a normal body mass index (BMI). In the school year 2012/2013, 9% of reception-year students and 19% of six-graders were obese. These numbers have been on the rise and no one can be sure of when, or if, this trend will change.

The school lunch tradition in the UK has been either a packed lunch from home or a school meal served in school canteens for a price for children to pay. Also, the children could choose to go outside the school, to get a snack or a meal from a shop nearby. This has been up to children and their parents to choose. Children from poor families have been eligible to get school meals for free in the canteens since 1936 (8). From September 2014, by law, all children aged 4-7 got their school lunches for free in the UK (1, 9). The reasons for the UK government to make this decision were several. One was that the average family spends more than £400 on school lunches per child and year, which many families could not afford. Another was that a study made by the Department of Education, had showed improved learning abilities when pupils/students were given a hot meal every day (1).

Nick Clegg, the Deputy Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, 2014, said (10):

“All the evidence, including the pilots in Durham and Newham, shows that free school meals will not only help ease the pressure on household budgets and encourage positive eating, but will also help improve concentration and raise educational performance so that, regardless of their background, every child can have the best possible start in life.”

From the school staff and pupils getting free school meals, some concerns has been expressed about the feasibility of universal infant free school meals (UIFSM) (11). To make the scheme happen, several schools had to make improvements, such as equipment updates and refurbishments in the kitchens, increase working hours, recruit new staff and rethink the structure of the school day to get more time for the lunch break. Catering managers were afraid that they had to compromise on food quality in order to meet targets. Head teachers were however mainly positive and thought that the scheme could increase child productivity and help parents to afford school meals for their children.

A healthy lifestyle and body weight have many positive effects for both children and adults (3). Children spend a large proportion of their day in school and it can therefore be assumed that what they eat in school is important. Only a few studies have been made about effects in learning correlated to consuming school meals. A 12-week case-control intervention study made in the UK, where students in years 3-5 were studied for concentration and disengagement, showed that pupils learning-related classroom behaviour might improve after having a proper school lunch (12). Also a randomized controlled study in the UK suggested that food provisioning and dining environments could improve learning related behaviours after lunch (13).

3.0 Aim

The aim was to investigate how school meals (especially school lunches) were depicted in different newspapers in the UK, from 2000 to 2014 when free school meals were introduced.

4.0 Methods

To see which topics about school meals were discussed during the time period in question, and in what way they were presented, four newspapers' internet-papers (e-papers) were searched for articles and letters to press (henceforth called 'texts'). The search functions used were the e-papers own. Keywords used were "School lunch" and "School meal".

4.1 Media sources and texts

Four newspapers were chosen for the study through a convenience sample, on the basis that all the papers had to be big in UK and with a daily circulation of at least 200 000 (Table 1). One of the papers had to be an evening paper and at least two different political affiliations should be included. The intention was however not to study the texts based on the source, but to get a broad overview.

The chosen e-papers were Evening Standard, Independent, Telegraph and Times (including The Sunday Times). Scientific articles were excluded from the study. There were three newspapers chosen from a total of nine UK national newspapers and one big regional newspaper (14).

² A UK national daily newspaper

All in all, 616 texts about school meals were found. Texts deemed irrelevant were excluded, for example those that focused on countries outside the UK. Also, some texts were published in the same newspaper twice but with a different title. Since the content of these texts were the same, one of them was excluded. After being grouped and reduced, there were 426 texts left to analyse.

4.2 Analyses

Mixed methods were used to analyse the texts. A combination of quantitative and qualitative analysis of the texts inspired by content analysis as described by Sandberg was made (15). Texts were analysed from one newspaper at the time, with the start in year 2000 and forward.

The analysis was made in three steps. First, a descriptive summary of the texts was made in a table (Appendix 1), showing text title, newspaper source, year of publication and the link to the text. Each text was read repeatedly and given a main content, or 'message' i.e. the kind of information the texts wanted to convey to the reader. One text could include several messages/contents, for example packed lunches and unhealthy meals, but the texts were categorized based on what was deemed the main message/content of the text.

The main messages/contents that shared a commonality were grouped into subjects and counted. To give an overview of the subjects, these were put in a table (in alphabetical order) indicating which years they were mentioned, also indicating whether the subject had been mentioned sparingly or more often (Appendix 2). The subjects of the texts were further combined into topics based on a judgement of similarities between them, to show the main focus during the time period (Figure 3).

4.3 Ethical aspects

In this kind of scientific research, the ethical aspects were mostly unproblematic. Since no persons were involved and only public texts were analysed, there was no need to get informed consent or to keep confidentiality. The study does not need to follow the information requirements, consent requirements or user regulations in the same way as if people were involved (16). However, even though the ethical aspects were at a minimum, there were still some aspects that had to be considered. Misrepresentation, exploitation, incorrect analyses and plagiarism were all aspects that can have an effect on this type of research.

5.0 Results

5.1 The quantitative results

Since the beginning of the year 2000, an increasing amount of texts in the four selected papers were seen to focus on school meals, their healthiness and what should be done about school meals. In the beginning of 2000, there were not many texts published about school meals, but starting in 2003 an increased amount of published texts per year can be seen (Figure 1).

A frequently appearing source of influence during these years was Jamie Oliver, a famous TV chef, who started a TV program 2003 called “Jamie’s School Dinners”. According to the texts he wanted to show everyone how bad the nutritional standards were in schools and tried to make them better.

During the studied years, different kinds of events took place increasing the number of published texts (Figure 2). In 2003, when the numbers of published texts started to grow, Jamie Oliver's campaign began to be noticed in the media. In 2006, when the next peak was observed, there were a lot of discussions why pupils did not want to eat the healthier school lunches, and that the packed lunches contained much of unhealthy foods. The year 2008 had a big peak, since a lot of new regulations regarding school lunches were made, such as the so-called “school break lock-ins” when children were not allowed to go outside schools on school time, fast food outlets in close proximity to schools were banned, unhealthy packed lunches were banned and minimum nutritional standard were implemented. Also in 2008, the Government started to talk about free school meals for all pupils aged four to seven years.

The Times/The Sunday Times was the e-newspaper that published most texts over all: 42% of those published during these years.

Noticeably, the amount of texts being written about school lunches increased over the years. There was an obvious process leading to 2014’s free school meals. Some subjects only got one or two texts per year, while some subjects got a lot more (Appendix 2).

Most of the texts were grouped into the main topics free school meals (12,7%) and economy (10,1%), but also packed lunches (9,4%), Jamie Oliver (8,5%) and unhealthy meals (7,3%) had a big influence in all the texts. The rest of the categories were written about in less than 30 texts (< 7%) (Figure 3).

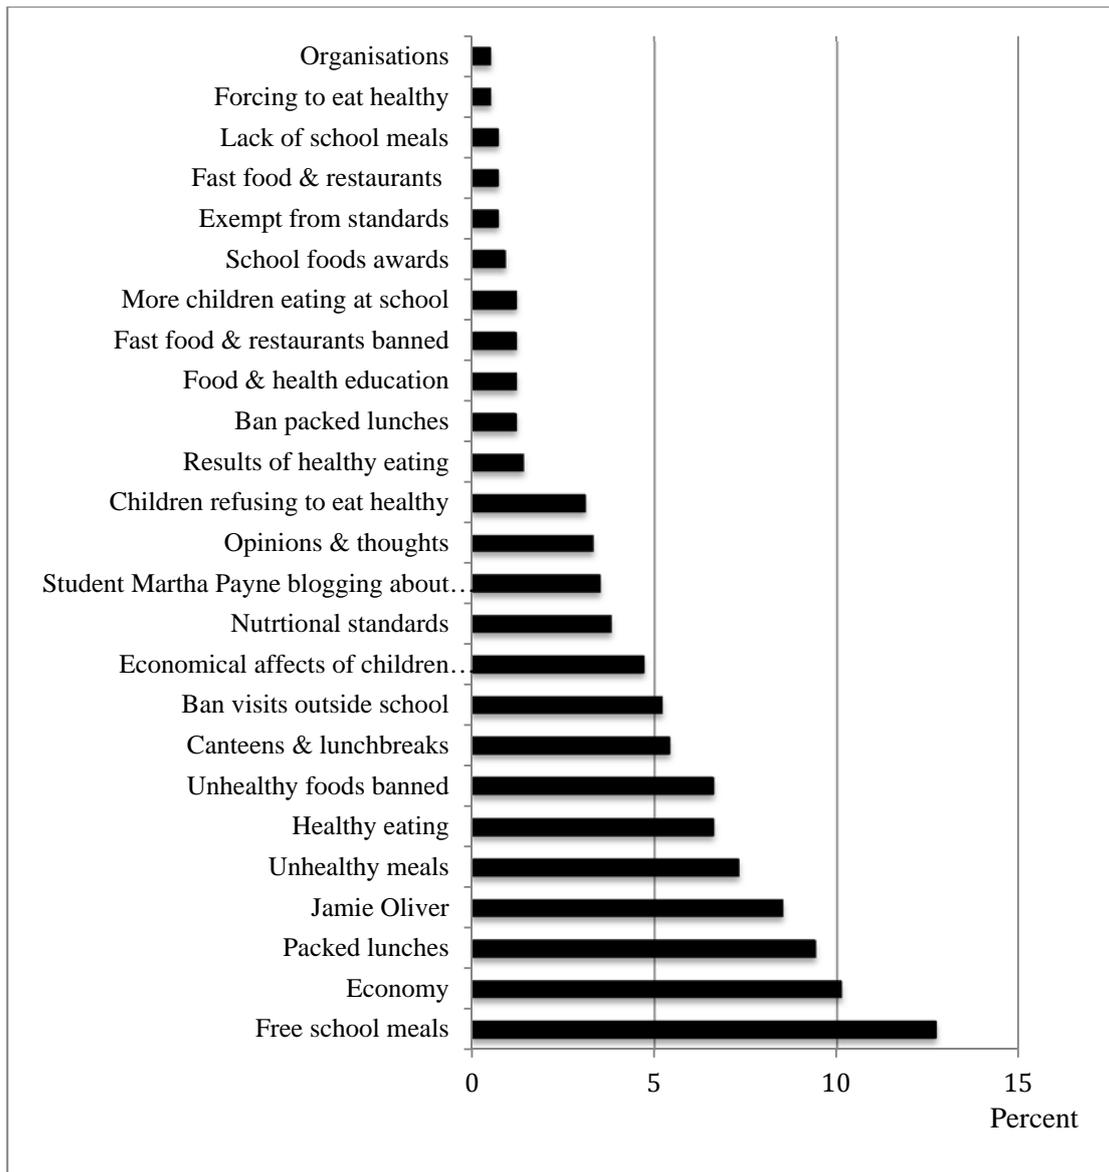

Figure 3. Proportion of texts with different topics related to school meals published between 2000 and 2014 in the four UK newspapers.

5.2 The qualitative results

Some negativity was seen in the text as negative subjects, negative opinions and a formulation of the context so that it would be more interesting or provocative for the reader. The subjects that were mostly portrayed in a negative way were: the nutritional standards of school meals and packed lunches, Jamie Oliver's campaign for better school meals, the ban on packed lunches and going outside school on breaks, the changes in the food standards and the costs of free school meals, and that the taxpayers were the ones paying for them. There were also some positive texts about the changes made in school meals and free meals for pupils.

Year 2000 (2 texts)

As seen in the studied texts, the discussed topics in the year 2000 were the bad nutritional standards in school meals and what healthy food could do to children's health if they consumed it. It was possible to see that some nutritional standards were being introduced for a second time in schools, along with a regulation which said that healthy food had to be offered every day. The nutritional standards had been introduced and rejected twenty years earlier according to The Telegraph.

Year 2001 (0 texts)

In year 2001 no texts could be found about school lunches.

Year 2002 (1 article)

The text on school meal found in 2002 showed that the discussed topics in 2002 were continued bad quality food in schools and that teachers, pupils and parents wanted to shun it. Some children were quoted as stating that they would like healthier options served in school canteens.

Year 2003 (19 texts)

In the year 2003, discussions started to occur in newspapers about the price of the food, about 31p per portion, which was seen as a scandal. Both the food in the canteens and in packed lunches was described as unhealthy. In the canteen, pizza and chips were children's favourite meals and also fast food that they could get outside the schools was popular. The beginning of Jamie Oliver's campaign was in October 2003, with the result that vending machines were getting healthier "snacks".

Year 2004 (17 texts)

Seen in the texts in 2004, school meals were described as bad for the children and Jamie Oliver's campaign against unhealthy foods started to grow. In the texts about the campaign, you could get the impression that pupils refused to eat the healthier lunches. Also, discussions about Finland having less overweight children than the UK were seen, and speculations about the connection to school meals. There were also discussions about packed lunches being even less healthy than school canteen meals.

Year 2005 (40 texts)

The texts stated, that since Jamie Oliver influenced the school meals, pupils chose to go outside the school to get something to eat or they took a packed lunch with them to school – instead of eating in the canteen. The texts described this as an economical problem, since the schools had to increase the prices when fewer pupils ate in the canteen. In the texts, it was possible to see that unhealthy foods (i.e. meals with more than 10% fat) were expected to be banned from schools. Crisps, chocolate and fizzy drinks should not be seen for sale in schools from September 2006.

The newspapers argued that Jamie Oliver wanted more economical help from the Government for school meals so they could serve better food to pupils. According to the texts, Jamie Oliver expressed belief that even despite his campaign, not enough changes in school meals were made and the Government agreed to raise the minimum spend on primary school meals to 50p per portion. According to The Times, Scottish schools already spent an average of 70p per lunch.

In the papers, the Education Secretary was blaming the parents for not putting more pressure on schools to provide healthy meals for their children. At certain schools this year, parents were given a say over what their children ate to encourage more healthy diets and fight the rising levels of obesity. Educating children about healthy food and fine ingredients were thought to be important this year. The Times revealed that some schools did not serve school meals at all.

Year 2006 (47 texts)

The texts implied that there seemed to be many reasons why pupils did not eat at school canteens, for example, lunch breaks were too short, and pupils did not have time to eat the healthier school canteen lunches. This discussion continued in the newspapers for several years, at least until the year 2008. Also the newspapers discussed that school meals were too expensive for pupils to buy.

In some texts, it was possible to see that unhealthy food was still common in the packed lunches and they claimed that Jamie Oliver said that 70% of the packed lunches were “disgraceful”. Besides packing bad lunches, parents were also sabotaging the campaign by taking orders and delivering fast food to the school gates, papers said.

In the year 2006, according to the papers, there was a shortage of money for Jamie Oliver’s campaign but at the same time the Government published strict new rules for school meals which led to Alan Johnson, the Education Secretary, reintroducing the minimum nutritional standards that had been rejected in 2000. The papers also claimed that the government and the schools limited the food children were given. There were a lot of thoughts whether banning some products like whole milk from schools was necessary.

“It’s about changing children’s habits and the culture in schools, rather than lecturing in a nanny way.”

Prue Leith , The Times
30.12.2006

It was seen in the papers that the schools had to start preparing more food from the beginning, but not all school kitchens were adequate enough for food preparation. Also, some factories gave their opinions in the papers about the healthier school meals. For example, the potato industry started to sell less when chips were taken off the school menus after Jamie Oliver’s campaign.

Year 2007 (19 texts)

Seen in the texts of 2007, the Government took action in order to make children eat inside the schools by banning them from going outside the fences on school breaks and making the canteens more welcoming for children to spend time in. Discussions between both private persons and celebrities started to appear concerning whether it was possible to force children to eat healthy.

In 2007 it was possible to see in the texts that 400 000 less children ate the served school lunches since Jamie Oliver’s campaign. Economically, the schools lost money on lunches when fewer children were eating and paying for it. Until 2007, the Government had spent millions of pounds on promoting healthy eating, but it was still possible to see unhealthy lunch boxes.

Noticeably, the Times highlighted a pilot study made in UK in year 2007:

"Pupils at eight primary schools are being given free, nutritious breakfasts, lunches or snacks for the rest of the academic year while researchers analyse the children's weight, achievement, motivation, ability to concentrate and level of illness. The results from the schools in North Tyneside will be compared with students from ten nearby schools that will not be offering free food."

*The Times
September 24 2007*

Year 2008 (60 texts)

In the year 2008, topics written about were the "inside schools lock-in" and that the councils ban prohibited restaurants from opening within 400 meters from schools and fast food vans to settle within 250 meters from the schools. Also, in 2008 the teachers started to check the children's packed lunches to exclude unhealthy lunch boxes, according to the newspapers.

A discussed topic was that the school secretary, Ed Balls, wanted to give free school meals to all young children to tackle obesity and improve concentration. The free school meals pilot, which started in 2007, was mentioned in several texts. The evaluation of the pilot study showed that obesity, general health and children's behaviour improved with an increased uptake of healthy meals. Even though the Government had not made this decision yet, some schools started giving free school meals to all pupils, according to papers. Texts said, that Scotland announced that all children in the first three years of primary schools were to get free meals in schools starting in 2010.

Texts stated, that there was a case study made in the UK about free school meals, where a whole city started this project, with the result of it being seen as too expensive. The economical prospects of this topic were discussed at length, and it was estimated that free school meals for primary school children would cost the Government 1 billion pounds per year.

Seen in the papers in 2008, the Government banned unhealthy packed lunches and also raised the prices of school meals available in school canteens. Discussions and comments about whether anyone had the right to tell people what to eat were visible in the papers. It seemed that the number of primary school children eating school meals had risen for the first time since healthier school meals were introduced in 2006.

Year 2009 (22 texts)

Even though it was starting to be a long time since Jamie Oliver's campaign, pupils still did not seem to want to eat healthy food at school meals. Two thirds of teens were shunning the healthier school meals and only 35% seemed to eat school meals at all, according to The Evening Standard. In primary schools, this per cent was 39 but it looked like the number was rising (July).

It was seen in the newspapers that Jamie Oliver thought that the Government should invest even more money in the healthier school meals. This year, Jamie Oliver was also trying to make school meals healthier in the United States (US). The Government gives new rules over school meals inspired by Jamie Oliver to prevent obesity. The pilot scheme for free school meals is given to some schools in London, UK.

Year 2010 (40 texts)

The problem with children not wanting to eat healthy food continued to make headlines. According to the news papers, only 1% of packed lunches met the nutritional standards and pupils did not want to eat any vegetables. In the texts, it was possible to see that parents were giving the wrong impression about healthy food to their children by letting them eat unhealthy foods. It still seemed to be a problem that children went outside schools to get their meals during breaks despite the policy to stay inside on breaks. The Government was even thinking about banning high-calorie foods from supermarkets near schools, papers stated.

Despite all these problems, results showed that the pupils who ate Jamie Oliver's school meals performed better in school, papers claimed. Still, the prices of school meals seemed to be rising, the reason seeming to be that fewer children ate the served meals at schools. Also, the number of children eligible for free meals appeared to be on the rise as families were struggling. In poorer families, some children were forced to take turns eating school lunches, since they only barely qualified for free school meals.

It was also possible to see in the texts, that the portions served in schools were too small, and that pupils were not feeling full after eating them. From the schools point of view, it was an economical aspect and was done in order to save money. This trend was possible to see in texts across different papers until the year 2012. During 2010, children in some schools were having protests against the healthy changes and about 300 pupils participated. This seemed to be a big protest, were even the police had to be involved.

Year 2011 (27 texts)

Seen in the newspapers, Michael Gove, the Education Secretary, ended the school lunch grant as a separate source of funding and exempt academies from the nutritional standards, which made Jamie Oliver fear for the future of healthy school meals. At the same time, prices had increased by almost 14%, and some parents were refusing to pay for school meals. Despite this, the numbers of pupils eating school meals had been rising during the year. In 2011, discussions about the economy were popular.

Talks about free breakfast have been occurring, since children were arriving to school hungry because their parents had not been able to afford breakfast. Parents' economy was still an issue in 2012 and visible in the media, since they could not afford breakfast or lunch then.

According to news papers, in the year 2011, there were big cuts in other areas of the budget and free school meals could be given to all children, poorer pupils would no longer need to feel "stigmatised". In Southwark (a part of London), free school meals had been given to primary school pupils every day.

It was seen in some texts, that schools wanted poor families to apply for free school meals, the more that applied, the more funding the school got. Discussions could be seen about possible discounts and offers for families with siblings. Also the Lock-ins during school breaks had been discussed this year, especially the question whether pupils eat at all when they were locked in schools.

Year 2012 (45 texts)

In newspapers in 2012 it was possible to see that teachers had to take personal action and give the pupils food from their own money, since their parents could not afford it. Even more families were seen as poor, and were now eligible for free school meals. It was possible to see that there were still a growing number of children eating the school meals, but $\frac{1}{4}$ of children entitled to free school meals were shunning them because they were too embarrassed to admit being poor. According to the newspapers, more pupils probably would have been eating lunches in schools if the canteens would be made to look better or more like restaurants.

In 2012, there were several writings about the school meals. Blogger Martha Payne, a nine year old student, blogged about school lunches and took pictures of what was being served at her school. According to the papers, the school forbade her from publishing pictures on the Internet but later, the council lifted the ban on her blog.

It was possible to be seen in the media this year, that $\frac{1}{10}$ of inner-city children visited a fast food outlet every day, while poor children living in urban areas may have been consuming fast food twice a week. The food standards were still low in some schools in the UK, the texts wrote.

Year 2013 (55 texts)

In the studied media it was possible to see, that in the year 2013 more than a million children were eating unhealthy meals at schools, since some schools were exempt the tough food standards.

The Free school meals plan was presented, and Nick Clegg, the Deputy Prime Minister of the UK, unveiled that all children in the first three years of primary school would get a free school lunch every day to boost learning, raise standards in the classroom and to improve the children's health. Negativity from the public against the funding the Government was going to give the schools for the free school meals could be seen in the news papers. The public thought that the money could be spent on other, more important, things. However, there were also comments and thoughts about how free meals should be given to all and not just to infant classes in primary schools.

This year, teachers in some schools were monitoring what kind of food children chose in the canteen, and awarded children that chose the healthy option. Also, an increasing number of families that couldn't afford school meals could be seen this year.

It was possible to see that schools were banning packed lunches as well, making children eat together in the canteen, since packed lunches had been kind of a social rank marker. A year after Martha Payne's first blog post, she had told the media that the school meals had not gotten any better.

Year 2014 (37 texts)

In the year 2014, texts that could be found were related to the free school meals that started in September this year. Since free school meals were a must, the schools were struggling with their kitchens and facilities, which were not good enough for preparing healthy meals for all the pupils in the first years of primary school. For example, small schools had to organise meals on wheels to meet the Governments commitment to free meals.

Discussions could be seen whether taxpayers should be the ones paying for the free school meals for children. The costs of the free school meals were calculated to £25 million. Something positive that was discussed in the chosen media this year was that the poorer children were performing better in schools, since the free meals were breaking down the social divisions within the classrooms and boosting children's learning abilities.

Speculations about whether free school meals were an election trick could be seen in the studied texts. For example, the Liberal Democrats announced that their election manifesto would include a commitment to extending free school meals to all children in primary school.

6.0 Discussion

6.1 Discussions of methods

Newspapers play an important role in the UK, and can therefore be seen as a good part of the media to study. Radio, television and other media could present events and changes in school meals in a different way than newspapers, but it was seen as possible that the topics and thoughts were the same regardless the media channel and more texts and news could be found through newspapers. With their internal differences, the four represented newspapers provided the study with a more diverse picture of the UK process. This could give this research higher internal validity. Although, three out of four newspapers were conservative and could give a more conservative picture of the situation. The political affiliation and founding year gave the reader of the paper an indicator about how authorised the newspaper was or what it would write about. One could imagine that, for example, the newspaper The Independent would only write in Nick Clegg's favour, since they both represent the same party (17).

Media logic means that journalists want to write about things that people want to read, and they can exaggerate the contents to get more readers (18). Also, the letters to the press could be written by anyone, and that could lead to exaggeration as well. The exaggeration of the contents could give a misleading picture of the reality, and therefore could risk the external validity. Because of this, it is important to understand that the contents of the texts only give part of the truth. Despite this, the topics discussed gave light to the events and gave a truthful picture of the process of implementing free school meals.

The study of the newspaper's e-papers had both pros and cons. Newspapers publishes texts on their websites that don't need to be published in the paper, and could have therefore given the study a wider range of texts. A negative aspect of studying the e-papers was that there were many texts found with the search function, and there was a possibility that some were overlooked while researching. This could jeopardise the reliability of the research. Also, there could have been more texts related to school meals that were not found with the used keywords. To minimise the amount of missed texts, there should have been more keywords used, such as "school food". Still, the search function gave a lot of hits and provided more texts, and faster as well, than if all papers from the five newspapers between 2000 and 2014 would have been physically browsed.

The chosen time period was long enough to depict the important turning points leading to free school lunches for all pupils aged four to seven. Even though the time span was broad, it would have been interesting to see what happened before the year 2000. For example, it would have been interesting to find out when the free school meals were introduced to poorer families through the newspapers. This started in 1936 (8).

The amount of studied texts was large and for only one analyser it was a lot of reading, and some information could have been overlooked. But if there had been several analysts, the methods and thoughts could have been different between the analysers. It was also possible that the analyser had a biased opinion before the study, and could have gotten the wrong impression of the texts. This could lead to bias towards the research result as well. To prevent this happening, it was important for the analyser to be objective. Even though some texts could have been overlooked in the chosen newspapers, it was possible that the represented amount of texts over this time span does the subject justice. It was also possible that the amount of studied texts could represent all of the other media's opinions on the topics that were discussed during this time period.

Since some texts that were seen as irrelevant were excluded from the study, it was possible that some information was neglected. Despite this, it was conceivable that the large amount of texts, some with several major topics, still have covered the main topics regarding school meals in the UK newspapers.

Even though several topics were written about in the text, it was easy to decide a main content/message from all the texts. A reason for this could be that the journalist has limited space they can use in the newspapers and were clear with what message they wanted to convey to the reader. This could prevent the decision of the topics to be mutually exclusive.

6.2 Discussion of results

In this study, the aim was to study how UK newspapers depicted school meals, especially school lunches. There were a lot of different discussions about the school meals during the studied years. The results could all be seen as a chain, where one thing lead to another: in the beginning, there were texts about bad nutritional standards of school foods, and in 2014, the Government launches free school meals to all children aged four to seven. One could assume that Jamie Oliver has played a big part leading up to the introduction of free meals since he has been continuing his fight against childhood obesity (19). During all these years, he has been a part of all big changes by at least giving comments and making his opinions heard. It was likely, that he has influenced or opened the Government's eyes to the big problem behind unhealthy eating: obesity.

Since Jamie Oliver's school meals campaign started with a television show it is an interesting matter to discuss if the publicity of the problem itself was the cause of a bigger change to the system. It could be, that the Government or the schools have known about the problem all along, but since Jamie showed it on television, it became a public matter and more opinions and hence, discussions started to form. The publicity for school meals could be one of the reasons for the school meals to be free eventually.

It was obvious in the texts that the main reason for the Government to make children eat healthier was to prevent childhood obesity, which the Governments reports agree with (9-10). Since it was seen in the texts that the Government were discussing why the Finnish children have a lower BMI than the UK children, it was conceivable that the UK Government saw possibilities to help the public health by lowering the BMI through children's eating habits. A survey study made in Finland 2010 shows that using catering services in schools are in some way contributing to healthy eating habits within the population (20). Since there was a correlation between using canteen services and healthy eating habits, it was possible that the UK Government's decision in favour of free school meals, and the steps towards making it the only option for pupils during lunch time on school days, could lead to better eating habits among pupils. Also another Finnish quantitative study, made in 2011, confirms that eating a balanced school lunch correlates with healthier eating patterns outside school (21).

In the texts, it sounds like a "drastic measure" to force children to stay inside the school area on school breaks. Since it's not possible to know how much of the texts were true, regarding to how much the journalists has been spiking up the texts, we assume that the Government has indeed been taking "drastic measures". From another point of view, there could be many positive things with this (other than children not buying fast food), like children's own safety from traffic accidents and the guardians knowing where their children were. Of course, some would argue that this could be seen as limiting or restricting the children's freedom.

Since the majority of the texts written about school meals contained an indication of preventing obesity, the growing amount of texts related to school meals could also be an indicator to increased health awareness and the awareness of the risks that unhealthy foods could give to children. This could also be an indicator of school meals awareness.

It was interesting to notice, that even though a lot of women have been working hard to improve the health standard, and to get a higher appreciation for school meals in several other countries (as Sweden and Finland for many years), in the UK it seemed possible for one man, Jamie Oliver, to influence the whole system. Even though Jamie Oliver has worked hard to improve school meals in the UK, different organisations have also been working hard for this cause. Children's Food Trust, School Food Matters and Food For Life are just some of the organisations working for better school meals in the UK. These organisations did not get as much of, or any publicity in the UK media during the years 2000 to 2014. The reason Jamie Oliver had such huge publicity, could be because of him being a powerful public figure, and, a man. It is plausible, that the organisations were not as attractive as Jamie Oliver for the media. Studies have shown that men emerge more clearly in media than women (22).

Together, The Times and The Sunday Times were the newspapers that wrote the most of the texts of school meals during these years. These two newspapers have been operating for the longest time of the five chosen newspapers. As mentioned before, it is conceivable, that the time of establishment could give the reader an impression of the authority of the paper. This could then give an impression of the authority in the problems that have been occurring around the school meals during the years 2000 to 2014. Also, The Sunday Times gave a separate appendix for their subscribers that only published school meal related articles. It was possible that The Times wanted to help with the school meals campaign.

It was clear, that all topics were not presented in media. One example was that Alan Johnson re-introduced nutritional standards to school meals in texts in year 2006 that were claimed rejected in texts in 2000. In year 2000 there was nutritional standards introduced that had been rejected twenty years before. They did not discuss the rejection about school meals in 2000. Since the rejections of better nutritional standards already happened several times, it is possible that better nutritional standards gets rejected again. The Government should prepare for this, and have a backup plan if this happens.

Henceforth, probably the biggest change in UK history regarding school meals happened in the year 2014, when free meals were given to all children aged four to seven, most of the texts treating the subject were published before the actual commitment. It was interesting, that during the whole of 2013, more texts were published on the subject than during 2014. Since a lot of texts published were opinions, this could give us a hint that the public had most of their minds made up even before everything started, or that they did not have enough of information and that this attracted opinions. It also could indicate that the Government tried to give the public as much information as possible before everything started by giving information and interviews to the press. It is also possible, that the public's attitude towards school meals have changed after all the publicity school meals gotten in the media, depending on what the media have chosen to write about.

The discussion concerning the nutritional value in both canteen meals and packed lunches could be seen as negative in the media. It was confirmed both 2013 and 2015 in scientific texts that packed lunches were worse than canteen lunches (23-24).

The free school meals could be a factor reducing differences between social groups and minimising the different economical standards between families. That would mean that children would become more equal and reasons to bullying would reduce, since it has been shown that obesity and poverty could be reasons for bullying, and children in risk could benefit from preventive interventions (25-26).

It's not likely necessary to go through all the procedures that the UK did. But, when making changes to school meal systems, the Government and schools probably have to address some issues, like the packed lunches, children's right to go outside the school area on breaks and what type of foods are served in schools. As seen, free school meals had a big process behind and it is likely that some kind of bigger process was necessary.

7.0 Conclusion

Over the years, a lot have been written about school meals in the UK newspapers. A process leading to free school meals in UK was seen, and it is possible that this could encourage children to a healthier lifestyle. In the newspapers you could see that there have been several regulations and actions towards better school meals and encouragements for children to choose the healthier foods. It is possible that people have become more and more aware about health and school meals, and the relation between these over the years. It is also likely to deduce, that one individual could make a difference if they just find the right channels for it.

8.0 Professional relevance

This thesis can be of value for all administrative dietitians, but also for clinical dietitians and for public health dietitians, who need to know what the big process could be like when trying to make societal changes to improve health, e.g. starting from bad nutritional standards in school meals, to actually getting healthy free meals.

Even though we all work for children to have a healthier ground to lean on it is important to realise, that media is a powerful source to mediate information to the public and the mediums have also a goal to get readers and to sell the papers. Therefore, it is important for the reader to be critical to the texts and also for us, who work with food to be careful when talking to press.
